College Catalog Sociology (SOCI)

Sociology and Anthropology (which may be studied as part of a Sociology Major) are the sciences of human community, society, and culture. The discipline's mission is to contribute to students' opportunities to become cultivated women and men in the broadest sense, and particularly to their opportunities to gain a mature understanding of the beliefs, customs, arts and institutions of humanity, of the ways that order and change proceed in society and culture, and of the contradictions which fragment communities, societies and cultures and impact the development of humanity.

Sociology has focused particularly on the development of the most developed societies of the world, and anthropology has been particularly concerned with societies of smaller scale. Both sociology and anthropology endeavor to increase our knowledge of the connection between individual personality, social interaction, culture, and social institutions. Thus these fields specifically address St. Norbert College's goal of producing students able to understand and come to grips with global sociocultural change. Moreover, a mature understanding of the causes and effects of human beliefs, customs, and institutions is essential to the achievement of moral wisdom.

We expect students who complete a Sociology major to have mastered the basic concepts, knowledge, and findings of the field of sociology as well as those of the particular concentrations (Sociology, Human Services, Anthropology) which they may choose within the major. Moreover, Sociology majors should be able to produce written inquiries into particular social phenomena and social issues which exemplify (1) clear presentation of the facts of the case as they are currently understood from various perspectives, (2) coherent analysis of issues involved, with a fair presentation of alternative interpretations, (3) original or at least illuminating research and/or analysis informed by relevant theoretical approaches and reflecting mastery of important methods used in sociology (particularly quantitative or statistical methods). And not least, we expect majors in sociology to be well prepared for benevolent creative engagement in the world, both in their vocations and in their voluntary service to others.

Research or teaching careers in either sociology or anthropology usually require a master's or doctoral degree; but a sociology major provides excellent preparation for graduate study in either those fields or others, including business, law, ministry, public administration, or social work. Sociology majors from St. Norbert College have found their vocation in a very wide variety of occupations, including government service, law enforcement, marketing, personnel management, social service, urban and regional planning, and others in which knowledge of human relations and behavior are important.

2005-07 Catalog Sociology Requirements

Sociology Major (10 courses): Students majoring in sociology may complete a traditional academic liberal arts sociology major or, along with their sociology core, take a concentration in anthropology or the human services. The various program options are given immediately below.

- Sociology Concentration: The traditional liberal arts sociology major focuses on substantive social issues, theory, and research. It consists of nine sociology courses and one course in statistics. Six courses are required (SOC 100, 111, 300, 351, 355, and SSCI 224) and four others as electives. Students are advised to take SOC 100 and 111 as freshmen, SOC 300 and SSCI 224 concurrently as sophomores, SOC 351 and 355 as juniors.
- Anthropology Concentration: The sociology major with concentration in anthropology consists of nine SOC courses plus SSCI 224. Course requirements include SOC 100, 111, 300, plus at least one social theory course (chosen from among SOC 351 or 355); and four SOC courses in Anthropology (from among SOC 245, 260, 312, and 314); and one additional SOC elective. Students are also strongly advised to take BIOL 100 as a cognate. Students are advised to take SOC 100 and 111 as freshmen; BIOL 100, SSCI 224, SOC 300 as sophomores, and the social theory course as juniors. Students who wish to attend graduate school in anthropology are strongly urged to study a foreign language.
- Human Services Concentration:
The human services concentration exists to prepare students for entry level positions in the fields of social work, social geriatrics, human relations, counseling, and corrections. Students are advised that it has become desirable and often necessary to study at the graduate level to progress in these fields. The sociology major with a concentration in human services consists of ten courses. Required courses include SOC 100, 222, 300, 351, 355, and 494 plus SSCI 224. In addition, students must complete one course in personality or social psychology (from among SSCI 220, PSYC 212, 221, 310, 312, and 325), and two elective courses carrying the SOC label. Human Biology is recommended, as it is often required by graduate schools of social work. Students are advised to take SOC 100 as freshmen; SOC 222, SSCI 224, and SOC 300 as sophomores; SOC 351 and 355 as juniors; and SOC 494 as second semester seniors.

Students should be aware that the Human Service concentration is in the process of revision. An outline of the changes will be published in the 2005-2006 academic year.

Sociology Teaching Major (11 courses): Teaching majors for secondary education certification in these fields consist of the same courses required for the sociology major or the anthropology concentration.

Sociology Academic Minor (7 courses): The academic minor consists of six courses, including SOC 100, 300 and 351 plus three additional sociology or anthropology courses and SSCI 224.

Sociology Teaching Minor (7 courses): The teaching minor in sociology/anthropology for elementary education majors consists of six courses in sociology or anthropology including SOC 100, 111 and 300; either SOC 351 or 355, and two additional sociology or anthropology courses plus SSCI 224.
