

What can I do with a major in History?

Overview

- As investigators into the past, historians make use primarily of evidence that has survived from the time or place they are studying, such as objects of art, artifacts, documents or literature. In addition, they utilize the later reflections of poets or statesmen and the studies made by archaeologists, anthropologists, geographers, economists, political scientists, philosophers and theologians, as well as other historians. Every field imaginable feeds into the study of history.

- As the French philosopher Voltaire said, history can be "a pack of lies we play on the dead." Historians search for truthful, accurate explanations of cause and motivation, but they also make value judgments and interpretations colored by their own experiences and biases. The way a historian looks at a particular event or figure may not be the way that event or figure was perceived at the time. Every historian comes at his or her work from a different perspective, which makes the study of history even more varied and fruitful.
